I decided to write down my conversation with God. Before this, I thought I should stop writing personal notes, but I couldn't because it's the only way I could be myself. And the things I can't share with anyone. I could do this with my God.

There was a two-month gap between my school and results, and all of my expectations became meaningless. I thought God was the only "way, the truth, and the life." I prayed to God for the strength to bear whatever happened in my life. I prayed to God for a better life than what I have now. I'm not the type of girl who wants everything. But I wished to have what I desired.

I informed God that I had enrolled at St. Joseph's College for Women. I enjoyed attending college, but not this particular college. Nonetheless, I was proud of myself for studying as a college student. I eventually felt some discomfort in the corner of my heart. I was 18 years old and still a burden to my parents. I had a lovely life in which I could be content. But not with all of my heart. I was hoping that my day of miracles would come soon. I'm not sure where I went wrong. I try my hardest to be pure and clean-hearted, and I frequently read the Bible, sing devotional songs, pray, and worship, but I'm still not sure what's wrong.

I wanted to be the best possible witness for my God. In my life, I only wanted two things to come true. One of them was that I needed to see my miracles. Second, I never wanted to reveal anything during those days because God knew (it was finding a man of mine-2022 feared to express in a note on those days if somebody would read it).

“In the sanctuary of my prayers, I pour out my hopes, fears, and aspirations, seeking divine guidance as I embark on this transformative chapter of my life.”
